

longer satisfy the definition of a "reservation" under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. It is my understanding that, even after amending section 168(j)(6) in this manner, numerous areas within Oklahoma will remain eligible for the special tax incentives because, even though such areas are not officially designated reservations, such areas nonetheless qualify as Indian country under section 1151 of title 18. Similarly, it is my understanding that lands held by native groups under the provisions of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act also would qualify as Indian country under section 1151 of title 18. Thus, if section 168(j)(6) were amended to define Indian reservation solely by reference to the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, lands held under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act would continue to be eligible for the special Indian tax incentives. In this regard, it is my intent that, if it is brought to the attention of the tax-writing committees that there are any Indian lands that technically do not fall within the definition of Indian reservation under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 but which could be made eligible for the special Indian tax incentives consistent with Congress' intent in 1993, then consideration will be given to further modifying the bill I am introducing today when it is incorporated into a larger technical corrections bill.

The technical correction made by the bill would be effective as if it had been included in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1993, that is, the technical correction would apply to property placed in service and wages paid on or after January 1, 1994. As a general matter, I oppose retroactive changes to the Internal Revenue Code. However, technical corrections to fix drafting errors in previously enacted tax legislation traditionally refer back to the original effective date to prevent taxpayers from receiving an unintended windfall. This bill corrects such a drafting error.

REDEFINING NATIONAL SECURITY

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1997

Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, March 10, in conjunction with our colleague, the gentleman from California, the ranking Democrat on the National Security Committee, along with the senior Senator from Oregon and the senior Senator from Minnesota, I participated in a day long meeting on the implications of allowing the military budget to stay at its current levels while trying to reduce the Federal deficit to zero. The basic point that we and others made is that unless we begin to make substantial reductions in the military budget, we will devastate a number of other important social and economic goals of our society by reducing Federal support for them to an unacceptably low level.

But none of us would be for reducing American military spending if by doing so we were going to put at risk our national security. Therefore, we began the day with a discussion of the genuine needs of national security today, and the highlight of that was a thoughtful, well documented analysis of our national security situation presented by our colleague from California who is the former chairman and current ranking Democrat on the National Security Committee.

The gentleman from California who came to Congress in 1971, after winning an election in which his criticism of the Vietnam War was a central factor, has become one of the undisputed experts in the country on national security policy. As my colleagues know, he combines a strong passion with an extremely powerful analytic intelligence and the result is an eloquent, forceful statement of the case for a more realistic and comprehensive national security policy, one which would allow us to save substantial resources from the military budget.

Mr. Speaker, because the need to reduce the military budget and make funds available for important non-military purposes is the central issue facing this Congress, I take the unusual step of seeking permission to insert into the RECORD the extraordinarily thoughtful and useful remarks of Mr. DELLUMS on that occasion, even though it exceeds the normal length of remarks which are printed here. But with a military budget in hundreds of billions, tens of billions more than it needs to be, I believe that asking for the expenditure of a few hundred dollars here to bring the case for reduction before the American people is indeed a bargain.

STATEMENT ON THE VICTIMS OF ABUSE INSURANCE PROTECTION ACT

HON. BERNARD SANDERS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1997

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss a terribly important topic: Domestic violence, and insurance companies' discrimination against women who are victims of domestic violence.

We do not know exactly how many women are domestic violence victims each year because the numbers are significantly underreported. An estimated 4 million American women are physically abused by their husbands or boyfriends each year, and 42 percent of women murdered in this country are murdered by their boyfriends or husbands.

I think we can all agree that the level of domestic violence in this country is a silent outrage, and it is absolutely unacceptable. That is why we must do everything we can to combat domestic violence. Further, it is why we can and we must prevent profiteering insurance companies from adding insult to injury by economically victimizing women who have already been physically abused. They are reacting to battered women by battering them again.

We know that insurers have used domestic violence as a basis for determining who to cover and how much to charge with respect to health, life, disability, homeowners, and auto insurance. A 1993 informal survey by the House Judiciary Committee found that 8 of the 16 largest insurers in the country use domestic violence as a criterion in determining whether to issue insurance and how much to charge for it. State surveys in Pennsylvania and Kansas both found that 24 percent of responding insurance companies admit to such discrimination, and I know of two cases in Vermont.

Insurance companies give a variety of reasons for denying victims coverage or for charging higher premiums. Some insurers say domestic violence is a lifestyle choice, like skydiving or smoking. That is absurd. We know that domestic violence is not a choice, but a crime. Victims do not choose to live with their batterers, but are often forced to do so for economic and safety reasons. When a victim tries to leave her abuser, her life is often at great risk.

When insurance companies deny, drop, or charge more for coverage of victims of domestic violence, it has very serious consequences. It means that someone who already has reason to fear for her life has one more major reason to fear telling someone, and to avoid getting help.

This insidious insurance practice sends exactly the wrong message. We should be doing all we can to ensure victims of abuse seek help and get away from their batterers. Instead, insurance companies are telling women they must not only fear physical retribution from their abuser, but also economic retribution from their insurer.

If a woman tries to get help, she must fear losing access to health care for herself and her family or insurance that provides for her family in case of death or disability. Battered women's shelters must also fear losing their insurance, as we have seen in my State of Vermont.

Insurance companies are effectively tearing down all the work that has been done over the last 20 years in creating safe havens and assistance for victims of domestic violence.

I am pleased to report that we had some success on this issue last year, when an amendment Congresswoman MORELLA, other Members, and I wrote for the Kennedy-Kassebaum health insurance reform bill became law. That amendment will ensure that victims of abuse will not be denied insurance in the group health insurance market. However, we still must prevent insurance companies from overcharging women because they are victims of abuse, and we must work to end this discrimination in all lines of insurance, not just health.

Today, we introduce legislation to protect victims of abuse across this country from being singled out as uninsurable.

Our bill, the Victims of Abuse Insurance Protection Act, prohibits all lines of insurance carriers—including health, life, property, auto, and disability—from using domestic violence in determining whom to cover and how much to charge for coverage. It has been endorsed by the American Bar Association, the American Civil Liberties Union Women's Rights Project, the Center for Patient Advocacy, the NOW Legal Defense and Education Fund, the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, Women's Action for New Directions [WAND], and the Women's Law Project.
